FOR YOUR INFORMATION...

PHOTOGRAPHY

Paper has a tendency to expand as it absorbs moisture and shrink when it loses moisture. In the heatset web offset process heat is applied to the paper in order to flash off solvent and dry the ink. After heating the paper is cooled, and a layer of silicone emulsion is applied to "recondition" it. The heating of the paper removes a percentage of the moisture content which cannot be replaced in the printing process. The width of the web will have reduced by several millimetres when it leaves the press, which results in about one millimetre of shrinkage per page.

In sheet fed printing the opposite occurs. Paper takes up water in the printing process and may stretch due to water absorption. When sheet fed covers are bound with web offset sections, the covers are trimmed flush with the inner sections. After the trimming the covers release moisture into the air and the web offset sections absorb moisture from the air. The covers may shrink slightly and the web sections will grow, web growth beyond the sheet fed cover will normally be evident on the fore-edge.

It may be possible to minimise the impact of this effect by careful design of the cover and page one of the content.
